American Gothic
THE ART INSTITUTE OF CHICAGO

The Fifty-third Annual Exhibition of American Paintings and Sculpture

OCTOBER 29 TO DECEMBER 10, 1942
GRANT WOOD

At the time of Grant Wood’s premature death in February of this year, the janitor of his studio building expressed his sorrow in these words: “We lost Grant.” We, we the people, lost him. It might well have been the epitaph for an American artist who, in the fifty years given to him, had won a standing in his profession and something more—a place in the hearts of the people.

It seems a fitting thing that here in this public institute where he once attended school and where he first won substantial recognition in the showing of his pictures should be assembled this memorial exhibition of the work of Grant Wood.

In the final analysis of any man’s art, it is the work itself that counts, not the personality of the artist. Yet, when the man of talent is also a rare and colorful person, legends grow up about him that frequently confuse the appreciation of his work. Such was the case with Grant Wood. So many conflicting stories were told of the man, one might well ask: To what extent was he clever? To what extent sincere? Was his attitude merely that of a skilful reporter or was it that of a true interpreter with a steady, integrated view of life? When all the legend is cleared away, what kind of person was he?

Grant Wood was essentially a simple man and this simplicity was not an artifice but the very keynote of his character. He had the calm assurance men have who are close to the earth and at home with ordinary people. His simplicity was sometimes misunderstood because he had along with it many qualities a simple man does not usually have—poise, for example, shrewd insight, and flawless taste. He was not a primitive in any sense of the word, but a man of complex intelligence who had managed to retain a freshness of vision and a serenity of outlook.

His paintings reflect the simplicity of his character. They are the logical expression of a serene, orderly, highly intuitive person. They are also the authentic representation of the elements of life the artist knew and belonged to—the earth, plain people, and familiar things. If he had lived in another time and place, the story would not have differed in its essentials. Such a man would have always got his feet on the ground. But the artist was an Iowan, deeply rooted in a specific locality and a specific culture. His work, therefore, is as indigenous to America as it is personal to Grant Wood.
Grant Wood’s love for his own people and background was real, his knowledge of them profound. His paintings have a factual authenticity, for he made it a point to keep his facts straight, but more significantly they have that kind of truth that comes from deep perceptive understanding. It is interesting that he went to the extent of consulting mail-order catalogues to authenticate details in his paintings, but it is important that he remembered his earliest years on a farm with the most singular vividness—the shape and color of prairie flowers, the characteristic song of grosbeak and rain-crow, the earnest faces and slow speech of farm people. It is important that he could recall, with almost equal vividness, his later boyhood in Cedar Rapids when, as a shy, serious schoolboy, he went about the neighborhood doing odd jobs and absorbing the quiet drama of the people. Thirty-five years later, he could take a pencil and lay out the entire part of town in which he had lived, describe each house and the people who lived there, and recount innumerable small but revealing incidents in their lives. It is important, too, that as a young man Grant Wood worked on farms, built houses, taught country school, and loved and remembered it all with extraordinary clarity. He was himself a part of the life he depicted in his painting, and his work is rooted in sure knowledge, not in casual impression.

And these pictures that were created out of intimate knowledge were also created out of deep emotion. Grant Wood was a man of infinite forbearance. It was partly the strict Quaker-Presbyterian background from which he came that made him so; and partly it was the adversity against which he had worked to support a family and learn his craft. Yet he loved life with a passion that was no less because it was deeply reserved. For him, it was not the grandiloquence, the great sweep of life in the mass, the bold overstatement. His world was a small, homely, intimate world seen with quaint humor and affectionate understanding. His method was one of understatement, and his special quality of vision was to find in commonplace, familiar things the greater meanings of life.

He was a clever, inventive man and this quality was at times a strength and at times a weakness in his art. A combination of humor, shrewdness and restraint made him a powerful satirist; yet, except for Daughters of Revolution and a few drawings, he did not aim at satire in his work—any more, as he put it, “than there is satire in any realistic statement.”
"The people I have painted," he said, "are types I have known all my life. I have not painted out their faults, but neither have I held them up to ridicule. I have tried to characterize them honestly, to make them more like themselves than they are in actual life. I admit the fanaticism and false taste of the characters in American Gothic, but to me they are basically good and solid people."

Faith is the strength of simple men, and locked deep within him, Grant Wood had this faith. He believed in the essential goodness of human nature, and in the existence of a power for good and order beyond this life. This faith he painted into his pictures, into the idealized patterns of the landscapes, into the grim but strongly human characterizations.

By his own example as a painter, and by precept as a teacher and lecturer, Wood urged young artists to paint out of their own life experience, and reminded them that their richest material was apt to lie close at hand. His regionalism was not a narrow, esthetic dogma or a chauvinistic slogan. It was simply the common sense of the creative man, the reiteration of an old truth valid in any time and place.

It is early to make a reliable critical appraisal of Grant Wood's work. This much, however, is already certain. Through his paintings, he spoke directly to the people as few artists have in our time. His was a people's art, and so he intended it to be.

"It is of the utmost importance to me," he said, "that my painting should stand the test of abstract design. But a goal of esthetic purity—if there is such a thing—does not interest me. I want to express something about life that will be intelligible to the average factual-minded person. Whether or not people approve of my work is not what matters. What does matter to me is that they should get something out of it, something that may lend, in some small measure, a certain pattern and clarity to their own experience."

Park Rinard

Mr. Rinard, the author of a forthcoming biography of Grant Wood, was chosen by the artist to write the story of his life and art.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTES ON PRIZE WINNERS

EDWARD HOPPER was born in Nyack, New York, in 1882. His early work aroused so little interest that he gave up painting for several years. In 1924 a one-man show of water colors which he had recently executed was received with such enthusiasm that he felt sufficiently encouraged to continue a career of painting. He began once more to work in oils and was soon acclaimed as one of the outstanding champions of honestly American subjects. He is noted for his clear-cut compositions, luminous color, and interest in light effects. His paintings are expertly designed, never overcrowded, and contain few people, though the buildings themselves are alive with personality.

ALFREDO FAGGI is of Italian origin, having been born in Florence in 1885. He had a sound basic training in the Accademia delle Belle Arti before coming to this country. He is highly religious in feeling, an attitude of mind which he expresses with great reverence and at the same time with great force in his sculptural compositions, the greater portion of which are concerned with religious themes. His Stations of the Cross at the Church of St. Thomas the Apostle, Chicago, and his St. Francis in Santa Fe are notable examples of work in this vein. His style is derived from medieval prototypes but conforms to his own very personal viewpoint.

PEPPINO MANGRAVITE is likewise of Italian origin and was born on Lipari Island in 1896. While in his teens he studied painting in Italy under a very exacting master. Later he continued his studies in New York at the Art Students League and at Cooper Union. He has twice been awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship and has held several distinguished teaching positions including a class in mural painting at the School of the Art Institute. His own paintings are colorful and romantic—a kind of eighteenth-century romanticism expressed in completely modern terms dealing with exuberant American youth.

RAYMOND BREININ was born in Vitebsk, Russia, in 1908. As a boy he studied with Uri Penn and later at the Vitebsk Academy of Art. After coming to this country he attended Saturday classes at the School of the Art Institute and evening sessions at the Chicago Academy of Art. His painting is highly imaginative and often possesses a nostalgic mood which recalls the church towers and white houses of his native Vitebsk.

JULIAN LEVI was born in New York in 1900. From 1917 to 1920 he was a pupil at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts under Arthur Carles, Henry McCarter, and Hugh Breckenridge. For several years after that he painted in France and Italy. Although he has been exhibiting for a number of years, he has more recently reached maturity in a series of canvases dealing with beach scenes and boats. He has a sensitive brushstroke and a rich color sense in which he often combines dull reds with warm sandy tones.

THELMA SLOBE was born in New York but has for some years been a resident of Chicago. Being entirely self-taught, she has been subjected to little in the way of influences or schools of painting. Her work, mostly small in scale, is clear-cut in pattern, simple in color scheme, and meticulous in handling. She applies the same enthusiasm to painting that her daughter, Laura, does to her semi-abstract sculpture.
DAVID BEKKER was born in Vilna, Russia, in 1897. As a young child he assisted his father, who was a painter and decorator. At eleven he entered night classes in the Art School in Vilna, and at fourteen was continuing his studies in Palestine where the family had moved. During the First World War he was stranded in Bucharest, but later went to Paris and London, eventually reaching the United States. He has a deep feeling for the folklore of Russia which he represents in a poetical and highly imaginative manner.

SIDNEY LAUFMAN was born in Cleveland in 1891. Formerly a student at the School of the Art Institute, he now spends the greater part of the time in South Carolina, with summer visits to Vermont. His subjects, which are usually rural scenes, are treated with a delicate sense of texture and a haunting, almost lonely, mood.

BIографические заметки на художников, получивших уважение

CHARLES M. WEST, JR., was born in Centerville, Maryland, in 1907 and studied at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts from 1931 to 1934. He won the Cresson Memorial Traveling Scholarship in 1934. More recently he studied under Donald M. Mattison and at the University of Iowa, and is at present a teacher at the John Herron Art Institute in Indianapolis.

VIRGINIA CUTHBERT was born in West Newton, Pennsylvania, in 1908. She received her B.F.A. degree from Syracuse University in 1930, and was awarded the Hazard Fellowship which enabled her to study in Europe. She also studied at the University of Pittsburgh and at Carnegie Institute of Technology.

JOSEPH HIRSCH was born in Philadelphia in 1910. He was awarded a four-year scholarship to the Pennsylvania Museum School of Industrial Art and graduated in 1931 with two first prizes. He studied in New York with George Luks in 1932.

LILLIAN LANDIS was born in New York in 1914. She is a talented young pupil of José de Creeft and had her first exhibition at the Pruna Gallery in New York last April.
