COPYRIGHT BY THE ART INSTITUTE OF CHICAGO, 1957

Design: Suzette M. Zuckier
Included in the Sixty-second American Exhibition this year is a group of paintings entitled American Artists Paint the City, which represented the United States at the Twenty-eighth Biennale in Venice during the Summer of 1956. The paintings were selected by Katharine Kuh, Curator of Modern Painting and Sculpture, who also wrote the catalogue, currently available for the showing of the Biennale paintings at the Art Institute.

Aside from this special feature, the main exhibition consists of some one hundred and twenty-five invited paintings and pieces of sculpture, all by living American artists, selected by myself. No artists represented in the Biennale group have been repeated. While no definite requirements were established as to medium, emphasis was placed on oil, tempera and collage, although one or two boldly handled water colors were also included.

In the art of mid-century America one can scarcely point to regional characteristics. A somber moodiness combined with an exquisite tenderness and delicacy of execution are thought to be the essence of the best artists of the Pacific Northwest, but surely Edward Corbett, who divides his time between Massachusetts and New Mexico, and Robert Eshoo of Boston have some of the same qualities. If a few years ago there was talk of the Chicago school, the Boston group or those concerned with the desert, the city, or surf and rocks, all such divisions are invalid today. Just about any point of view is as likely to turn up in one place as another. Abstract-expressionism continues to be the dominant style among younger to middle-aged painters and their point of departure from nature is apparent to varying degrees. If a tendency to return more to recognizable sources is evident, as it seems to be in a number of cases, this is not a return to traditional forms of expression but rather a new concept or a fresh way of envisioning the object or the scene which the artist has selected for his theme.

This exhibition which is intended neither to be all-inclusive nor, for that matter, conclusive, is made up both of well-known artists and those comparatively little known whose work is both personal and expressive and exemplifies the leading directions of our day. Art in this country is ever in a fluid state and no prophecy could be made as to what the next step will be. Similar forms of expression exist throughout the free world; in a sense then today’s art may be considered to be international. America is making a contribution as vital as any and, at least among the younger artists, is probably in the lead. The impact of the American show at the Biennale was great, a fact that became increasingly apparent as larger numbers of European critics saw it and expressed their admiration in the press.

American sculptors continue to favor various types of forged, brazed or welded metal, feeling that this allows them the greatest freedom as creative artists. Some of them would say that the sculptor who carves in stone or wood is not truly creative but merely laying bare or revealing the form already inherent in the material. While this point of view is most certainly debatable, it is nonetheless true that our modern sculptor-welders have unlimited freedom of operation. Their creations, often open-work in character, depend as much for their effect on the shapes of the enclosed spaces as on the forms themselves. While this compulsion towards welded sculpture probably finds a remote ancestor in the nineteenth century blacksmith or tinsmith whose extra-curricular creations displayed much Yankee ingenuity, the more direct influence comes from our own industrial age where welded steel structures are constantly being built and factories are busy making everything from automobiles to thumb tacks.
